

FEEDING FAMILIES IN NEED WITH THE FARMLINK PROJECT

VIDEO TRANSCRIPT

Will Collier: Every person in America should have access to food. That's why the Farmlink Project is on a mission to ensure that the billions of pounds of produce which would otherwise go to waste goes to food banks instead so that every man, woman and child goes to bed with a full stomach.

Since me, my twin brother Ben and a few college friends founded the Farmlink Project last April, we've managed to salvage and transport over 30 million pounds of fresh, nutritious food to those who need it. And with your help, we can do even more.

Our volunteers are building databases of farms that are willing to donate surplus produce to local food banks. Then one hundred percent of individual donations go towards moving food from A to B, paying farm workers to pick and pack food and drivers to deliver it.

If food waste were a country, it would be the third largest contributor to global greenhouse gas emissions in the entire world.

So every pound of food we keep away from waste and put on tables makes a real difference.

We've achieved a lot so quickly and now we want to build an even larger impact. Since I joined Accenture in November, I've received incredible support from people at all levels of the business.

Every day, I'm reminded that equality, inclusivity and doing the right thing are values that we all share. And it's those same shared values that help Farmlink build a better future for all of us. Farmlink is my cause on MyGiving.
